The two terms Service, Project-based, and Experimental learning have been buzzwords for several years. As technology progresses innovative options for implementation continue to evolve. Learning objectives are key as well as the overall focus for this type of learning. I can recall past jobs and how the focus varied from confidence builder, team builders, scholastic improvement, and hands-on processes to assist in tying together objectives learning in course work. Service, Project-based, Experimental learning will continue to evolve because as having the ability to hit the ground running in a respective career increases in importance, service organizations and colleges will continue to provide ways to close learning gaps. Not only does closing learning gaps increase productivity but this process also allows validates to continued progressive elaboration of the learning based processes. CertificationPoint.org has developed an innovative approach over the past 6 years which educational institutions (and their student) have become increasingly receptive to. Our processes not only assist educational institutions by validating an institutions' status among the elite, but also provides reportable metrics to display how a college's student base fare after college...thereby validating the associated costs.
